

Steven Ostrover

eJones

Steven Ostrover is an economist and entrepreneur. He is currently the President of eJones, an internet startup that supports various types of group collaboration by providing real-time, continuously updating metrics reflecting community points of view on issues of shared interest. He previously co-founded an internet startup providing a group communications service.

Mr. Ostrover worked for approximately fifteen years as an economic consultant. Most of his work centered on advising government agencies on deregulating electricity industries and developing competitive wholesale markets, and advising electricity companies on competing effectively within these markets. He also advised on related strategic and financial issues.

Mr. Ostrover has a B.S. in mathematics from MIT, an M.S. from Stanford in operations research, and an M.S. from Berkeley in economics and public policy.
